Reading

If you glance at a map of Britain, with a bit of imagination you might think that it looks like someone sitting down. Scotland is the head; the arms are folded over a very full tummy to make Wales; Devon and Cornwall are the outstretched legs and feet; and East Anglia is, well, what we use to sit on. If that is the case, then the backbone of this craggy figure must be the Pennines – a range of hills, moors and mountains that divides northern England. Large sections of the Pennines are protected as an area of outstanding natural beauty.

1. According to the text, what are Devon and Cornwall?

2. Find and copy the name of the place that is described as a range of hills, moors and mountains.

3. Find and copy the word in the last sentence that is closest in meaning to looked after.
